Mr. O'Connell is an incredible author who manages to develop the characters, fill in the back stories, and give sufficient background while avoiding the all-too-common "necessarily boring" stretches in books written even by some of the most talented authors. A beautiful work of Science Fiction/Religious Fiction/Fantasy (pigeon-holing the book into a genre is a seemingly impossible task), the story is thrilling from the prologue all the way through the epilogue. Be warned: It will cause you at least one day of being off your game at work, school, etc. The result of being unable to put the Kindle or smart phone aside and staying up too late, trying in vain to find a lull in the book and get some rest. Going into the story too much would give too much away but, suffice it to say, there are plenty of twists, shocking moments, and unexpected breaks from the cliched norm. In the rare moments the book does begin to take a bit of a cliché turn, a character in the book will likely make the observation before the reader; simultaneously creating a moment of subtle comic relief while making a fantastical story somehow more believable by the mere observation. I believe this is Mr. O'Connell's first book, which makes it all the more amazing that he has managed to compose a work that is already among my favorite pieces of fiction. The author takes on and brilliantly meets the Herculean challenge of presenting a work of fiction that necessarily addresses fundamental good and evil without coming across as pious, preachy, or even religious.
