Synopsis

Split This Rock Recommended Poetry Books of 2014 Praise for Allison Adelle Hedge Coke: "These are the songs of righteous anger and utter beauty." —Joy Harjo From "Carcass": Split skin stretched over marrowless cage, encased dry tomb, like those strewn through this loess reach, cradling past ever present here, and now you come walking riverside, bringing sensory thrill into daylight much like this cervid aeculled morning each waking before demise. We move this way, catching life until death captures us, where we rotate into the same dust holding multitudes before us, and welcoming those beyond. Allison Adelle Hedge Coke is a poet, writer, performer, editor, and activist.

Customer Reviews

When I first heard about this new work, I thought it was music. Maybe it was the title, but from the first brief glimpses I saw, I expected poetry set to music. There is an album of this out there like that, but even with the text of these poems I was not wholly wrong. Allison Adelle Hedge Coke's poetry has always struck me as having an inherent musicality to it, and these poems are no exception.

Even beyond the music in the words and the arrangement though, there is a constant connection to the music of the world itself. There is a silent music in the patterns of things, both sweet and discordant, and it seems to me that these poems are firmly linked to that. Whether you think I'm totally off base on that or not, I don't think you could reasonably find fault with these poems. This is some richly vivid and elegantly moving writing.
